The Evolution of International Society

This chapter discusses the idea of international society and some of its historical manifestations. 'International society' refers to the rules, institutions, and shared practices that different groups of political communities have developed in the course of their interaction. It has taken many forms over 5,000 years, but today's international society is composed of interconnected but independent sovereign states.

UN & the Evolution of International Society In the contemporary state of affairs, the evolution of international society can be seen and assessed in terms of the evolution of the UN. The UN as universal body of nation states pledges for the world peace and to avoid any possibilities that might lead the world into another major conflict. International society today has evolved to discuss and deal with the modern day problems of global climate change, nuclear non-proliferation and so on.
